THE POWER OF A GIFT

This year is quickly passing by and before you know it, we will be in the holiday season. In two weeks, we will be packing shoeboxes for Operation Christmas Child which is another reminder that Christmas is just around the corner. Gifts have been on my mind this past week. We have been studying the Five Love Languages in our growth group on Sunday nights and this week we looked at one of the languages which is gifts, both giving and receiving. One of the questions I asked is what is one of the best gifts you have received? So, let's stop a minute before I go on and ask yourself that question. What pops in your mind? The first thing that always pops in my mind is a gift my father gave me when I was a teenager. It wasn't any special occasion at all. It was my first gun. It was a pistol that one of the police officers in our town was selling because he needed some extra money. To this day I am still unsure why he gave it to me, the younger son and not my brother (he later got him one too). But it meant a lot because he thought of me, and it was kind of a rite of passage moment too. Though we didn't always get along it is still something I treasure. Another gift also comes to mind of a picture collage Patricia made me for the office on our 10-year anniversary. It includes pictures from when we were dating, our marriage and our growing family. It means more to me each year.

So, what did you think of? So much of the time it is as much about the person giving the gift as it is the actual gift. The gifts my kids give me also mean so much because they know me so well and it usually has to do with something we enjoy together. When someone takes time to think of you and either spend time creating something or search out something to express their love for you. It is a physical or tangible representation of love.

The English word for gift comes from the Greek word Charis, meaning "grace or an undeserved gift. A gift isn't something we work for because then it is just a payment. When we start to look at the gifts that mean the most to us and the reasons why, it starts to give us a better understanding of God's gift of grace to us. It is definitely not something we can earn for ourselves no matter how hard we try or want to try. It is something given freely, that we accept; realizing the love, the sacrifice in what is being given. We know we don't deserve it and yet when we understand the true value of what He offers we treasure it with all that we have. We also get a better understanding of the heart of our Savior by the gift He gives.

When we get a treasured gift, what do we do? We want to show everyone. Let's continue to show others the greatest gift we have received.
